 SHORT STORY OF THE DAY. 60000000000 • 0000000000

WHILE SUPPER WAITS.

L. M. Thurston, in the Gentlewoman. 'Miss Ginny, I 'clar' I cyarn fin' Mars George nowhars."

Virginia laid her fingers lightly on the arm he offered her.

"Have you looked in the captain's room?" he asked as he led the way down the long hall to a room on the other side.

They paused a moment at the doorway.

"There seems nothing here—"

"Except the fire."

"That does look alive!" Virginia exclaim-

"Except the fire."

"That does look alive!" Virginia exclaimed as she noticed the glow that shone on the white pine floor and gleamed from the knobs of the teaster.

"Aren't you cold? You've not been dancing. Come, warm yourself for a minute. Listen how the wind howls and the snow bests against the window! It's not often we have such a Christmas in old Virginia.

Virginia listened smilingly. The man at her side was not a fluent speaker and was wont to use few words.

"There are no chaire here," he added, as he looked about him.

"Oh, never mind. I shall try the rug for a minute, I s'n tired."

The young man leasted against the blackpainted mantelpiece and looked down at her—her dark, rough hair, her rounded check, where a tiny spot of crimson flickered, first here, then there. How he longed to catch her up and kiss it there, down by the curving lips, before it fled upward to her black hair—she looked so far away kneeling there on the braided rug.

He racked his brain for the thing he wanted to say. He had planned his sentences over and over again on his long drive from the store to the captain's house; had whispered impassioned words beneath his breath while the wind whistled and the show blew about him: had waited his chance all the evening, and, now it was his, he was dumb.

Virginia looked up and these now of the snow blew about him: had waited his chance all the evening, and, now it was his, he was dumb.

Virginia looked up and the snow of the snow blew about him: had waited his chance all the evening, and, now it was his, he was dumb.

he was dumb.
Virginia looked up and then away quick-ly: there was a consciousness in her face that stung him to speech, to say just what was surging through him at the that stung him to speech, to say just what was surging through him at the moment.

"You are so far away there. You are always so far away. Are you going to stay so forever? Get up!" He caught her by the hands and lifted her to her feet. "You make me feel—I never forget who I am and who you are. Can I never be anything more? Is it because I have been motherless, fatherier, nameless all these years?" He spoke now with the rapid utterance and entire confidence of the reticent man fully aroused. "The whole country knows li-how Dr. Vaughn found a laby in the house that stood in the path of battle, and from which everyone else had fled. I wonder if my mother ever missed me, or if I had a mother, or if—"Ton't speak of it now, don't think of it," whispered Virginia, softly.

"How the doctor cared for me," he went on unheeding, "brought me home when he came back on sick leave; how he educated me—and yet I never was his son, not even his adopted son, only the little fellow he would not desert."

"Ah! yes, the doctor meant right—"
"I know, he was a lonely, broken old man, that was all. But you know—don't tell me not to speak it—you know that it was this that kept me from you—your father."

Virginia's dark head sank.

Virginia's dark head sank.

"Oh! no one is good enough for you in his eyes—and no one is—and what name does he think fit to mate with his? Not one in the county; but I love you."

He still held her hands and he tightened his clasp upon them. "I can take care of you, too," he added hurriedly. "I have bought the old place opposite the store—what did you call it? Stately? Well, it is mine. I will give it to you for a Christmas gift—for something else." He lifted her hand and placed it on his coat just over the heart. "For this," he whispered, as he stroked it gently. Virginia's dark head sank. the heart. "For this," he whispered, as he stroked it gently.

Virginia's red lips quivered, but she met ner.

PUTTING HIM DOWN AS A BAD CHARACTER.

She."Whatever makes you look so sad. Willie?"
He. "Why, I came here to the character of a Matador, and the silly idiots have put me down on the programme as a Door-mat!".

The young girl stepped back from the roomful of dancers into the hall.

"Can't find him?" she queried, anxiously. "Yas'm, an' de coffee done bile an' all detables ready, an' Mars George he nebber forgib nobody for 'nouncin' dat suppanicas ways 'twas hisseif."

"Of course, of course," ejaculated Virginia, impatiently. "Just keep the coffee hot: I'll look for him myseif."

"What's the trouble, Miss' Virginia?" asked a tail young fellow who followed ner out into the big bare hall. "You look anxious. Is there anything I can do for you."

stroked it gentily.

Virginia's red lips quivered, but she met his eyes bravely.

"Richard." she said, "there's something else; I must do as my father says—I can do nothing else—I am all he has. Hush! there is someone coming—the music is over. She put her hand to her head, and looked about her in a bewildered fashion. "Oh! and we must hurry."

They had been gone but a second, when a tall, gray whiskered man rose from a low chair behind the big bed. The captain had been galantly offering every chair he could find to his guests, until, worn out with his standing, he had remembered the low flag one behind the bed which was too shably to move, and had no sooner settled into it for a moment's rest than he fell asleep, to be awakened by Richard's voice as he pleaded his cause.

The old gentleman chuckled with silent merriment to think he find such a joke on the big gray eyed merchant who sold him goods gave him his mail, and listened to his old war tales.

"Ah! he had the thing on him." he chuckled, "but he would be a sighed and pushed back his thin hair. Suddent. It was Virginia's voice he heard—how could he dare—what was that—did she?—"she would do as her father said." Ah! they were gone.

He rose slowly to his feet. Then he sighed and pushed back his thin hair. Suddenly he straightened himself, and went
